HARRY CHRISTOPHER.

The Round Corner Drug Store is known to every man woman and child in Greenfield and surroundings. Situated on the Public Square it has as a landmark a reputation similar to that of Mabley & Carew's or Oskamps, Nolting & Co's. in Cincinnati. Nor is its reputation as a first class, up-to-date drug store in any way inferior. The genial proprietor of the Round Corner Drug Store, Harry Christopher, came to Greenfield a little over three years ago. His capital was small, but his knowledge of the pharmacopeia was large and his ambition but little less. He decided to pitch his tent—if we may use the expression—on the corner of Washington and Jefferson streets where he could catch trade coming from the four points of the compass. He “knew his business,” and he did not have to wait long for customers. He handled drugs and compounded prescriptions with a rapidity and precision which astonished his patrons and made of them fast friends. But he depended not alone on his own efforts. He called printers' ink into requisition and thus made known to the public the merits of various delightful lotions, tooth powders, and hair tonics which his inventive mind called into being. All of these remedies are now household words and the public swears by them.

We present in this issue a very fine view of Christopher's drug store. The photo was taken in the summer season when the ice cream soda business was at its height. This has become one of the most distinctive features of modern American drug stores, and in Christopher's it has been developed to an extraordinary degree. Every afternoon and evening in the summer and fall the soda fountain is a busy place and the handsome tables are crowded with merry laughing throngs who revel in fruit flavors, “don't cares” and those other marvellous nectars dispensed by the nimble fingers of the assistants. Just now Christopher's is busy, not alone filling prescriptions, but in selling beautiful Christmas presents in the shape of pocketbooks toilet sets, manicure sets, bric-a-brac and those other thousand and one little articles which are appropriate for Christmas gifts.

The Round Corner Drug Store or as it is better known, Christopher's Drug Store, is one of the institutions of Greenfield. It has come to stay. It has won a well deserved popularity not alone by the excellence of its goods, but by the unwavering courtesy and attention accorded its numerous patrons.
